0.9in. New Internet developments pose greater and greater privacy dilemmas. In the Information Society, the need for individuals to protect their autonomy and retain control over their personal information is becoming more and more important. Today, information and communication technologies and the people responsible for making decisions about them, designing, and implementing them scarcely consider those requirements, thereby potentially putting individuals' privacy at risk. The increasingly collaborative character of the Internet enables anyone to compose services and contribute and distribute information. It may become hard for individuals to manage and control information that concerns them and particularly how to eliminate outdated or unwanted personal information, thus leaving personal histories exposed permanently.

These activities raise substantial new challenges for personal privacy at the technical, social, ethical, regulatory, and legal levels: How can privacy in emerging Internet applications such as collaborative scenarios and virtual communities be protected? What frameworks and technical tools could be utilized to maintain life-long privacy? During September 30, 2009, IFIP (International Federation for Information Processing) working groups 9.2 (Social Accountability), 9.611.4 (IT Misuse and the Law), 11.4 (Network Security) and 11.6 (Identity Management) held their 5th International Summer School in cooperation with the EU FP7 integrated project Primelife in Sophia Antipolis and Nice, France. The focus of the event was
